

MARKET

— Review —

Q1 2024 proved to be a positive quarter for the global stock market. The sheer appetite of investors wanting to buy into the market ahead of well flagged interest rate cuts has been very powerful, which has pushed investors into equities over bonds. The belief, based on compelling evidence that the US economy is going to avoid a recession, is a clear confidence backstop helping investors to get comfortable getting back into the market from a rough 2022 and 2023. What has been an interesting development in this Q1 rally is the sectors doing well have broadened out to include more than just the Magnificent 7, which was just about the only major US sector in 2023 that investors were flocking into. Unsurprisingly, as the equity market has rallied on a more buoyant economic landscape, we have seen corporate and high yield markets continue to rally ahead of their government bond counterparts.

In terms of figures, the US Treasury market is down 1% over Q1 2024, which isn't too disastrous considering treasuries rallied over 6% in Q4 2023. On the corporate bond side, the picture looks better with corporate and high yield funds returning 7% over the last 6 months vs. the global bond market, which is up just 2% over that same time period.

PORTFOLIO ACTIVITY

The strategy for this quarter resonated around two emerging themes in our portfolio construction. Firstly, to acknowledge that US dominance in equity markets may continue and we were looking to benefit from that momentum in a measured way by prioritising high-quality, resilient leaders in sustainability. We did this by introducing a new US strategy from Janus Henderson, a house with a pedigree in sustainability-focused equities. We then added to this with a top up of the Regnan Sustainable Water & Waste fund, which has continually impressed by the low volatility of this strategy relative to other sustainability-focused thematic funds, while delivering consistent long-term performance. The second part of our strategy was to take the attractively valued opportunities outside the US, which have been somewhat left behind in comparison.

We increased our high-quality Nomura Global Sustainable Equity strategy accordingly and rotated our direct emerging markets exposure into a different strategy. The fund managers of Aberdeen's Sustainable EM fund have set up a new franchise at Premier Miton. We have met this team multiple times and are confident in their ability to deliver an exceptional sustainability philosophy through material SDG alignment, as well as their ability to identify long-term winners in this space, at a time where these names are looking cheap versus history.

OUTLOOK AND STRATEGY

In TAM's view, Q2 will likely be a more volatile one than Q1 as investors need more of a reason to keep buying stocks and not to retreat to the safety of government bonds. To us, this spells a market that can certainly rally across the full breadth of 2024 but will happen in fits and starts as the data lends itself to inflation then deflation tilts. We have seen allocations to value investing, - which routed growth stocks in the final March rally - starting to garner interest once again, which is great to see for a diversified client portfolio.

We see more positivity coming back to Europe and emerging markets as investors go hunting for good companies with cheap share prices. Gold and silver are tipped for strong performance in Q2, along with broad commodities, all providing an area for optimism. A reassuring backstop for continuing positivity will come from central banks proving they are keen to start lowering interest rates, so should we see a recession on the horizon then expect to see swift support coming from central banks, which will help to stem any severe selloff.
